The TSEA is a test projective, aimed at assessing the level of social inclusion of a child and adolescent. It is a test used only by a psychologist to assess the reality of the boy (both hearing and deaf) from the age of six to the end of adolescence. This test consists of paintings that represent illustrated chapters of everyday life that give room for a person to express orally what he sees as a brief narrative that allows the characteristics, after an in-depth study of the oral answers and classifying them, to understand the extent of integration of the boy or teenager and his harmony with himself and others. The summary of the answers concludes: (I) Merge - (H) Inhibition - (EC) Escape (from reality and from self). It also determines the extent of communication with others and emotional incision.
